BACKBONE OF COLD WAVE BROKEN, SAYS THE WEATHER MAN

Higher Temperatures Promised-River Craft Are Being Recovered.

Washington still finds itself in the grip of the cold wave which has swept this section of the United States since Sunday night, but there is hope in

According to the Weather Burgan, the person who was so reckless as to pay to get furs and fur coats out of storage will be able to wear them but little for some time yet. The present cold spell, the bureau officials say, has about passed, and with each succeeding hour temperature will go higher.

The tempering of the cold wave has done much toward helping the Wash-ington and Alexandria boat and launch owners, whose craft were swept away by Suncay night's blizzard, to recove by Suncay night's bizzard, to recover their property.

The heroic work of Thomas Travers and William Dudley, passengers on board the Edna Earle, the yacht loaded with Washington men, women, and children, which came perilously near going to the bottom in Sunday night's squall, in saving the lives of four occupants on the accompanying boat Augusta, has become known.

Mr. Travers is claim agent of the Washington Virgisia Railway Company, and Mr. Dudley is a well-known Alexandria business man.

The two amateur sallormen volunteered to go out in the frail boat of the Edna Earle during the fiercest part of the gale, and carry from the small launch, Augusta, which threatened to sink at any moment, the four almost frozen occupants. It took four trips to relieve the Augusta of its passengers. Both of the rescuers were nearly frozen when their task was completed. Temperature is higher today than at any time yesterday, and the Weather Bureau officials say that milder weather will prevail for a few days.

Police Search River For Disabled Boats And Their Occupants

With Sergeant Raney Passeno charge, the police harbor boat Vigilant, searched the Potomac river for six hours yesterday afternoon for injured hours yesterday afternoon for injured boats and their occupants, many of whom barely escaped the fury of the gale of Sunday night.

Leaving the harbor precinct at noon the police boat went down the river as far as Bryan's Point. Between Washington and that place it was discovered that twenty small craft had been stranded on the river banks in shallow water.

water.

The aid of the police boat was found unnecessary, however, as all persons to make good their escape.

In many instances it was found that the boats were driven to the Maryland side of the river, and where it was possible the occupants got out and walked to nearby farm houses. At Broad Creek, where the Edna Earle and the Augusta were handled so roughly by the storm, were two other small boats, but the occupants of these managed to get ashore in a small crart and spent the night with a fisherman.

tugged away in order to get them in deep water.

Old boatmen on the river think it remarkable that there were no deaths from the storm. Ordinarily in such blinding wind and rain boats are capsized and usually fatalities result. It also is believed by the old boatmen that the storm of Sunday night will have the tendency to bring to the top of the water bodies of drowned persons which have never been found. Usually the bodies of persons who are drowned in the fall are washed up in the spring when the water is warmer.

A few minutes later this dealer, seeing Mr. La Fontaine's rig at the door and thinking it had been sent from the stable, got in and drove away.

He drove around the city until nearly a o'clock, when he returned to the 6 oclock, when he returned to the stable and put the horse up. In the meantime the livery rig had been standing at the market all day, and the police had been hunting for Mr. La Fontaine's horse.

In response to the queries of the two Americans, Heredia then described the political situation in Valo.

Six years before Don Antonio, supported by a political faction north of the Caco—the part of the republic that contained the bulk of the Spanish population—was defeated by Gen. Ramon Munez in a contest for the presidency. Threatened with imprisonment, Don Antonio fied to the city of Pamacay, and thence, with 300 adherents, he fought his way to Valo, being the first white man to set foot in this old Indian town for more than half a century.

man to set foot in this old Indian town for more than half a century.

Here, in a manner that not even his supporters were able to understand, he suddenly won the confidence of the Coshan chief, Gandaiap, with whom he made a secret treaty. From President Munez he received a pardon and au appointment as governor of Valo.

Since then his rule in the city has been absolute, and one of the many peculiarities of his government was the fact that all persons, other than Coshans, who came to Valo were forbidden to leave it by way of the Durango river.

Scores of Americans and subjects of Great Britain had come up the Durango with large quantities of materials to be used in railway construction, and to be used in railway construction, and these had been sent with the materials in the direction of Moreno, in the northwest. It was rumored in Valo that great bridges had been built in the cordillera, but the men who were said to have built them never returned to Valo. "Is it not possible that these went down the Iquiquil from Moreno?" Handley asked.
"It is possible that some of them did.

"It is caused by the root of the garican plant, which is found in certain marshes. It is remarkable how many of Don Antonio's enemies frequent those marshes."

"You mean that Don Antonio poisons his enemies?" Sparhawk asked quietly. Heredia sipped his wine.

"Some of them," he answered gravely. "Death is the most important member of our governor's council, for ber of our governor's council, for Death solves all of Dcn Antonio's difficulties. I myself have an appointment with him temorrow."

"With Don Antonio?"
"No-with Death" Sparhawk started.
"You are jesting, senor!" he ex-claimed.

Heredia smiled and shook his head in courteous denial.

"Any resident of Valo will tell you that this morning Alegandro Heredia, charged with assaulting Lieutenant Brabanti, one of the governor's proteges, was sentenced to death, and that he will be shot by the monastery wall at daybreak tomorrow."

Sparhawk and Handley made no attempt to disguise their amazement. They gat in silonce till Handley said:

He rose and offered his hand to Sparhawk.

The face of the American engineer had grewn suddenly pale.

"In heaven's name, man, you don't mean to tell me that you are going to let this tyrant take your life without making some effort to same it?" Sparrawk exclaimed.

"When a man finds himself in midocesn, with no vessel or raft in sight, there must come a time when he will throw up his hands." Heredia replied with a smile.

"There is no help for it, sir," said Hemingway, shaking his head gravely. "Today, it is Heredia who is saying farewell to his friends. Tomorrow it will be you if you are not more cautious in the expression of your opinion concerning Don Antonio."

The faces of Sparhawk and Handley were gray as, without speaking, they shook hands with the smiling Heredia. The doomed man then turned to Hemingway, placed both his arms around his neck, and frew the distorted face to his. A minute later he was gone.

CHAPTER V.

Light On A Dark Subject. C EVERAL persons who were seated eyed Sparhawk and Handley curiously as they seated themselves with Hemingway after Heredia's decarture. "There ought to be some way of getting him out of the hole," said Sparhawk moodily. "There is none," Memingway replied.

"How did it all happen?" asked Hand. "Lieutenant Brabanti is one of Don Antonio's pet scoundrels. Heredia, like myself, was a member of the party that accompanied Don Antonio when he accompanied Pon Antonio when he fought his way south, but for the last year he has been in disfavor.

"He and Brabanti were in love with Senorita Aguero, and Heredia was the favored suitor. Two days ago, while he was with the young woman, Brabanti insulted them both.

"Heredia knecked him down. He was tried and found guilty of insubordination. For this he was sentenced to be shot. There is no help for it."

"You are an American?" Sparhawk asked.

asked.
"Yes."
"And were a member of Don Antonio's expedition from Panacay to Valo?" Valo?"
"Yes. I've been a good many things in my life. I was brought up on a ranch. Next I became a prospector. Then I got religion, studied theology, and was critained as a preacher. I was sent out as a missionary to Quincatan. "At San Felicidad I saw some Sierra Blanca ore. That gave me the gold fever again. Don Antonio learned that I was a practical miner, so he persuaded me to accompany him in his fight." "Well?" queried Sparhawk, as the other paused. "Well, that settled me," said Hem ingway, abruptly.

"You have seen some pretty sharp work with him, I dare say."
The eyes of Hemingway gleamed like

The eyes of Hemingway gleamed like coals.

"Pretty sharp," he assented in a whisper, which as it came from his distorted mouth gave to his auditors a strange sense of creepiness.

Sparhawk, usually plain speaking, oftentimes lacked tact, but, despite his present anxiety to learn how Hemingway had come by this strange disfigurement there was something in the present aspect of the man that forebade the young engineer to proceed farther with this line of inquiry.

There was a brief period of silence, then Hemingway assumed the role of interrogator.

"You've been brought down here to something on the railroad?" he "You've been brought down here to do something on the railroad?" he asked.

"Yes."

Hemingway glanced quickly around the room. Assured that none of the persons who were seated at the other tables was sufficiently near to overhear him, he crossed his arms on the table and leaned forward.

"Tell me about it," he said in a low voice which, however, had in it rather more of command than of invitation.

Puzzled by the man's manner and the expression of eagerness on his face, Sparhawk hesitated and glanced at Handley, who gave a nod that was barely perceptible.

Hemingway marked the hesitation. He took a sip of his wine and looked thoughtfully at the foor.

"Never mind, then," he muttered. "After all, it's no business of mine. Still, by exchanging a few notes the three of us would be wiser all round. Perhaps some other time—"

"No, let us make the exchange now," said Sparhawk quickly and with a little laugh. "There is no secret about the matter so far as I am concerned. I have been appointed chief engineer of the Calistar railway and have undertaken to complete its construction in four years."

Had Sparhawk suddenly opened a box and dropped a live rattlesnake on the table, the effect on Hemingway probably would have been quite similar to that produced by this announcement. He started wolently, his eyes widened, and every trace of color left his face.

"Who engaged you?" he asked.
"A chap named Quexores."

"Where were you when he engaged you?"

"In New York."

"In New York."
"You saw Quexores in New York?"
"Yes. He told me that one of his reasons for making the long journey from Quincatan was to secure my serv-"You are well known, then, as an

"Pretty well known—yes."
"What was his second reason?"
"To dispose of bonds worth $40,000,-

"The devil! Do you think he'll raise "The devil! Do you think he'll raise that sum?"

"He seemed to be in a fair way to do it when I left," Hemingway's hands were trembling nervously, his mouth was open and there was a strange, burning, haunted look in his eyes. As he sat in silence, looking at one of the walls, Sparhawk and Handley watched him curiously.

"I'm glad you told me this, but—but, but I'm afraid it won't do us much good—now," Hemingway muttered, as but I'm afraid it won't do us much good—now." Hemingway muttered, as if he were speaking to himself.

"What do you mean?" asked Sparhawk sharply.

"I mean that either you have come to the end of your rope or I have come to the end of mine. It is clear that you have been brought down here for one of two purposes. It may be that Don Antonio really does intend to put the road through, and—"

"Have you had any reason to doubt it?"
